Canada belongs to the G8 which is a group of eight advanced industrialized countries in the world. So, the country boasts a strong economic as well as education system. Over the years, it has been a preferred destination for international students who find its education infrastructure, institutions, faculty, and programs of the highest standards. There is also the option of completing a specific program in either French or English or in a blend of both. Hundreds of specialized subjects are available, ranging from aerospace engineering to zoology. However, the most eye-catching aspect of the Canadian higher education system is the emphasis on a large number of research activities in a variety of fields.

While the universities in the country offer all kinds of bachelor, master or doctorate level programs, colleges here mostly offer bachelor's courses to students. According to StudyAbroadUniversities.com, some of the best universities in Canada are McGill University, University of Toronto's International Foundation Program, University of British Columbia, University of Alberta, and Université De Montréal. The McGill University principally offers master and doctorate programs in architecture, biochemistry, law, biology, biomedical engineering, chemical engineering, civil engineering, communication studies, computer science, business administration, etc.

StudyAbroadUniversities also presents information on different scholarship programs available for international students. Some particular Canadian universities only provide scholarships to overseas students. As the competition is very high, you have to work in advance to get the benefits of a scholarship. Canadian Commonwealth Scholarship Program, Canada Asia-Pacific Awards, and Vanier Canada Graduate Scholarships Program are to name a few.

Highlighting the significance of Canada for international education, a representative of StudyAbroadUniversities.com says, "Every year, above 3,500 Indian students land on the Canadian shores, thereby making them the seventh largest population of foreign students in that country. Therefore, we strive to offer complete details regarding a study in Canada by adding up-to-date information on various universities, programs, admission requirements and visa requirements regularly on our website."
